The book is a collection of recent and new research and studies in theory and applications on household economics and production, consumer behaviour and demand analysis, and economic policy, their interrelationship and impact on growth, development, national and international accounts, trade and welfare in world economies in the 21st century. Researched and written by internationally acknowledged authorities working in this field, the book is in honour of Duncan Ironmonger, Director, Households Research Unit, University of Melbourne, by his colleagues for his sustained and significant contribution to the subject. The book also has the authoritative recognition and the timely focus of bringing in one convenient reference and textbook the diverse concepts and important applications and, aptly in a contemporary context, of scholarly and practical and applied studies. It is a valuable reference and text book for academics, advanced courses in commerce and economics and marketing, social security and welfare analysts, business and government economic advisers, and trade and welfare policy-makers world-wide.

Discussions with colleagues on the significance, interest and important aspects of household economics and production, consumer theory and their current development in the context of contemporary microeconomic policy in particular and macroeconomic and welfare policy in general had been most useful. The dedication by the contributors to the project and to producing their work on schedule is much appreciated.

The editor wishes to thank: Brendan George of Ashgate Publishing for his support for the book concept; and Margaret Finch of CEDIR, University of Wollongong, for her contribution to desktop publishing, edits and Quality Assurance of the content of this publication.

Again, I am deeply indebted to all close and extended members of my family for their support and sacrifice during the preparation of this book.
